Excerpt: .my short hair, said Esperance, colouring and laughing. Claude did not contradict her, but in reality it was the change in her expression which he meant. Mariana had fascinated him, but this was something far higher! He longed for fresh opportunities of studying her face, so bewitching, whether in its sweet gravity or its smiling radiance and animation. I hope you have good accounts of your brother, he said, delighting in the swift kindling of the eyes at his words. Yes, Gaspard is very well, she replied, I hear from him every week, such long letters, too, almost like a journal. And does he like his work? Very much indeed. He has to superintend the coolies you know, and see that they work well, he is out of doors all day long, and is getting so strong and well again. I always feel when I read his letters how very much we owe to you and Sir Henry Worthington, I have always longed to tell you how very, very grateful I was, and Gaspard told me it was quite your doing that he came to Rilchester--it was so good of you to send him, it made the parting so much less bitter. There was deep gratitude in her expression, just touched with sadness, then in a moment she smiled again, that pure, radiant, winning smile. Claude felt as if he were in some delicious dream--he made some brief response, he hardly knew what, and...
