Dept. of Justice, Office of Justice Programs, National Institute of Justice, 2002. LC Number: HV6439. U5 R47 2002 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)50450103 Subject: Gangs -- Research -- United States. Excerpt: . . . A Decade of Gang Research: Findings of the National Institute of Justice Gang Portfolio Do female gang members need programming different from that for young women who are not gang members but are involved in other forms of serious misconduct and delinquency Can programming for female gang members operate independently of other interventions for gang members Can programming for female gang members operate independently of other interventions for young women who engage in other forms of serious misconduct and delinquency Which types of programming are most successful in reducing the involve-ment of female gang members in serious misconduct and delinquency The chapter begins to fill in some of the gaps that must be addressed in developing, implementing, and evaluating programs targeted to young women in gangs. Unfortunately, such programs often have mirrored programming for youth in general, thereby preventing the research team from answering these questions and from providing firmer guidance to others interested in the answers. Trends in Youth Gang Homicides Few topics in the area of gang research have attracted as much attention as gang homicide. Past research has focused on the correlates of gang homi-cides, the definitions of gang homicide, trends in gang homicides, and the differences between gang and nongang homicide. Cheryl L. Maxson, G. David Curry, and James C. Howell have all made important contributions to the past literature on this topic, so their current work (chapter 4 in this volume...
