AS a rule the indulgence of any humour is a prophecy of its repetition, and our likes or dislikes, our hopes or our suspicions, are apt to be confirmed by an open expression of them. Fredas jealousy of her lover received for her a seal of confirmation when she found her own belief in it had been sufficiently strong to induce her to betray it in his presence. If George had come to the cottage, and she had been by that means amused and made happy, the impression created by the incident of the morning might not have been so strong. But he stayed away, uncertain whether her prohibition had proceeded from any real reason, or from mere perverseness of temper--in which case it was equally deterrent: and she spent a dull evening in the company of Mrs. Burton, who, though an excellent and...
