Not illustrated. 1921 Excerpt: .at as early a point in the curriculum as consistently can be provided in accord with the underlying purposes of the junior high school. If, as early as the high seventh, it is definitely determined that the alternatives of leaving school or preparation for industrial or commercial placement are inevitable to a small residuum of pupils, then such pupils should be permitted to choose, under careful scrutiny of individual needs, the electives determined wise for each as a result of the exploratory courses. This is a regrettable concession but a concession to needs positively demonstrated to exist. Moreover, the concession does fulfil to a degree one purpose of exploration. The necessity justifies the concession and individual justice is promoted by adapting organization to needs. The exploratory courses of the high seventh are, consequently, confined to an increased allotment of time to practical arts, home economics and the most elementary aspects of commercial work. A few pupils may be segregated for occupational training but the large majority will continue the exploratory work of the low eighth. In this high seventh semester commercial arithmetic may be given as part of the mathematics course and a separate period assigned to first lessons of business, practical arts and home economics increased in amount, and the former for this term given in the separate shops in place of the general shops in case the organization includes separate type shop facilities. The exploration is, therefore, by means of material in itself worth...
